Today the world is in turmoil with many unresolved conflicts flaring up. The times are tough but we must understand these unresolved disputes do have a reason!

There are many reasons why countries disagree with each other; mostly the causes can be attributed to differences related to history, politics, economics, and culture.

Territorial disputes can develop when two or more countries contend over control of a particular area of territory or resource. Economic concerns or historical border disputes may be the cause of these conflicts.

Often there are major ideological divides between nations. Conflicts over different values and interests can arise between nations especially if they have different political structures or ideologies. A classic example is the difference arising from political beliefs, democracy and communism.

Economic issues often influence conflicts. Relations can be strained by trade disputes and competition over resources like oil. Disparities in economic development can also cause tension since wealthier countries may try to preserve their interests.

Finally, disagreements may result from cultural and religious differences since different behaviours and beliefs can breed intolerance.

In conclusion, disagreements between nations are complicated and rooted in various territorial, ideological, economic, and cultural issues. Maintaining international stability requires finding peaceful solutions through diplomacy and collaboration.

Analysing the reasons of disagreement

It is evident throughout history and in the recent past that conflicts centred around territorial expansion and differences in social and political ideologies often create friction between the two parties involved.

The root cause of disagreements between two countries is riveted around each party protecting their political and economic interests, which further erupts into a full-blown conflict affecting millions of civilians from each side.

Disputes are ordinarily focused on the extraction of resources from one side of the two parties involved leading to imbalance and sustainability issues. Consequentially as a ripple effect, there is also an economic impact such as a decrease in tourism and a lot more.

History also plays a pivotal role in such conflicts since resolutions need to be passed taking into account the historical events that might be the foundation of this dispute.

Disagreements between countries affect international relations and trade, conflicts which are consequences of these disagreements often lead to war. Funded by the central powers of the world affecting the commoners and the economic status of the two parties involved.
